22 January, 2009. ADC KRONE, a world leader in providing global network infrastructure products and services has chosen NextiraOne, experts in communications services in Europe, to deliver a uniform, centrally managed communications infrastructure.

NextiraOne will upgrade the entire LAN infrastructure at ADC's EMEA Headquarters in preparation for the roll out of IP telephony. The new infrastructure will comprise of the latest 3560 PoE switches, which will be integrated by a communications management software with around 450 IP-based telephones. Finally a high-performance voice messaging system within the application environment will complete the solution.

"We decided to upgrade our LAN infrastructure and move to an IP based communications solution in order to benefit from the lower operating costs, a centrally managed information and telecommunications infrastructure and the option of implementing unified communications applications in the future," commented Jörg Glamann, Manager EMEA IT, ADC Krone. "We chose to work with NextiraOne to implement the project due to its reputation as a strong integration and service provider."

"Projects like this one are not awarded solely on a price basis. The range of services we can provide and support along with expert advice and consultancy during all the stages of the project have ensured its successful completion," said Axel Schnell, COO, NextiraOne Germany.
